Ranking

Rank	Candidate	Fit score	Overall	Recommendation	Top strength	Top risk
■ 1	Sample Candidate 2	82/100	Strong	Advance	Four years closing hard technical roles at a hypergrowth AI company	No verified signal on mission alignment with defense or national security
2	Sample Candidate	62/100	Moderate	Hold	Rare analytical ops backbone from Ramp and Accenture	No independent full-cycle recruiting ownership verified
3	Sample Candidate 3	62/100	Moderate	Hold	Operator-strategist hybrid with proven hiring-process impact at scale	Zero full-cycle recruiting execution experience in any formal seat

Recommendation

Advance Priya Nair first. Her four years closing 60+ technical hires at Databricks — including 40% sourced from passive candidates in the most competitive AI hiring market of the decade — is direct, verified evidence of the core job function. She is the only candidate who has actually owned and closed a full-cycle recruiting motion at scale in a comparable environment, which neither of the other candidates can demonstrate. The mission alignment gap is real but investigable; her skills gap is not a gap at all.

Why not the others

- Jordan: The central requirement is sourcing and closing competitive candidates independently — Jordan has never done it. Supporting 40+ hires as a coordinator is categorically different from owning a requisition, and no amount of Greenhouse dashboard fluency or Accenture consulting background closes that gap on day one at Palantir.
- Marcus Bell: Same structural problem, different resume wrapper. His 30% time-to-fill improvement at Snowflake was process consulting, not recruiting execution — he has never cold-sourced a candidate, run a debrief loop, or negotiated an offer close. Palantir is not hiring a talent transformation advisor; it is hiring someone who can work a req.

If you could only interview two

- Priya Nair — the interview must test mission conviction specifically: probe whether she has engaged with Gotham, AIP, or Palantir's Army contract before this process, and whether her answer is considered or rehearsed.
- Jordan — the interview must test full-cycle ownership directly: ask her to walk through a candidate she personally sourced cold, drove through a loop, and closed, and listen for whether she can name one credibly.
